Background

Research consistently details the negative physical, emotional, and economic consequences of intimate partner violence, child maltreatment, and children's exposure to intimate partner violence (collectively, hereafter referred to as 'family violence') on the development and wellbeing of individuals, families, and communities.¹⁻³ Given the considerable overlap in the occurrence and burden associated with the various forms of family violence, advocates, practitioners and policy makers continue to make considerable investments in primary and secondary prevention. One such investment includes supporting health and social service providers to be able to adequately recognize and respond to family violence in clinical practice. However, evidence from Canada and elsewhere indicates that health and social service providers report challenges related to recognizing and responding to family violence in their practice encounters.⁴⁻¹⁴ Consistent challenges noted in the literature include a lack of education (both formal and informal) with respect to knowing about the signs and symptoms of family violence exposure, where to access education related to family violence, how to initiate discussions about family violence with patients/clients, and what to do when family violence is disclosed.

The Researching the Impact of Service provider Education (RISE) Project is a three-and-a-half year, three-phase project funded by the Public Health Agency of Canada (PHAC) that began in November 2019; the public launch of the project was June 16th, 2020. With a focus on the disciplines of social work and medicine, the RISE Project uses a model of implementation science to increase the capacity of these health and social service professionals to be able to recognize and respond to family violence (inclusive of child maltreatment, intimate partner violence, and children's exposure to IPV) in their practice encounters competently and confidently. To achieve this aim, Phase 1 of the RISE Project involves a series of parallel activities to: (a) determine the scope and salience of the family violence learning needs and preferences among social work and medicine trainees and practitioners across Canada; and (b) develop a suite of materials that can support social work and medical professionals to enhance their knowledge, attitudes, skills, and behaviours related to recognizing and responding to family violence. Phase 2 and 3 of the RISE Project will determine whether the Violence, Evidence, Guidance, and Action (VEGA) family violence educational resources support improvements in social work and medical practitioner knowledge, attitudes, skills, and behaviours related to recognizing and responding to family violence in their clinical encounters. Further information about VEGA can be found at vegaproject.mcmaster.ca; the RISE Project is currently in Phase 1 of its proposed activities.

The present report outlines the findings of an environmental scan that was conducted for the purpose of developing a menu of existing family violence education opportunities for health and social service providers, including social workers and physicians, in the Canadian context. Led by the RISE Project's Research Consultant, Alice Cavanagh, with oversight from the project's Co-Lead, Dr. Meredith Vanstone, the environmental scan was completed over the course of four months from April 2020 to July 2020 and involved an extensive data collection process that followed a standardized protocol that was based on environmental scan methodology.

What follows is a detailed description of the research question, methodology, and results of the RISE Project environmental scan. Identified training opportunities were indexed into a menu that includes 285 French and English training resources that: (a) are focused on practitioner knowledge, attitudes, skills, and behaviours (KASB), (b) are related to recognizing and responding to various aspects of family violence, including Intimate Partner Violence (IPV), Child Maltreatment (CM), and Child Exposure to IPV (CEIPV), (c) and are designed for a Canadian social work or physician audience, and (d) were produced between the years 2000 and 2020.

Training opportunities presented in the resulting menu have not been analyzed or evaluated in any way and are instead presented as training/learning materials, resources, or opportunities which may be of interest or value to physician and social work members of the RISE Project’s Collaborating Organization’s (see Table 1), or to other health and social service providers across Canada and who are interested in deepening their knowledge related to family violence.

Methodology

Environmental scanning describes a directed process of information gathering and analysis for use in research and/or strategic planning.¹⁵ While no unified methodology for environmental scanning has been proposed for use in health professions education research, environmental scanning has been used in analyses of professional development and education resources,^{16,17} as well as in the development of national-level education programming for undergraduate and post-graduate medical education across Canada.^{18,19} The uniting feature of the various methodologies of environmental scanning is a specific research question that provides conceptual boundaries for the scan, as well as a flexible approach to focused data collection that can involve an array of data sources, including:

academic and grey literature reviews, interviews, focus groups and consultations with key informants, direct observation of participants and practices, and documentary analysis. Importantly, the yield of environmental scans is a cross-sectional snapshot of current practices, processes, and/or protocols at a particular moment in time and which are within the conceptual boundaries of the scan's research question.^{15,20,21}

Environmental Scan Research Question:

The present environmental scan addresses the following research question, “what online, publicly accessible training materials are available and which aim to increase the knowledge, attitudes, skills and behaviours of Canadian physicians and social workers related to recognizing and responding to family violence in their practice encounters?”

Identification of Training Materials:

To address the scan's research question, our team adapted methodological principles of environmental scanning outlined by Hatch and Pearson¹⁵ as well as Charlton and colleagues.²⁰ The process began with the Lead (A. Cavanagh) generating a list of Canadian organizations that had potential involvement in the development or provision of family violence education/training to learners or practitioners in the disciplines of medicine and/or social work.

Next, the Lead developed criteria for training resource inclusion and developed a list of keyword search terms that could be used in a google site search function to search each organization's website for training materials related to IPV, CM, or CEIPV. Sampling criteria included the ability to classify the training material as having a target audience of “health and/or social service providers,” as well as a publication date of 2000 or later. The broadening of inclusion criteria to ‘health and social service providers’ was informed by the experience and expertise of the RISE Project leadership whereby it was felt that providers often seek training outside of their discipline for complex social and public health phenomena, including family violence. In addition, given significant advancements in the field of public health with respect to the epidemiology, prevention, and intervention of family violence over the last two decades, it was felt by the RISE Project leadership that the inclusion of any training resource prior to 2000 would be out of date or potentially contradict advancements in the evidence. Identified training/education materials, resources, or opportunities were inventoried via a process that involved the application of a Boolean Google site search strategy within each organization's website using two clusters of keyword search terms. Due to limitations on the number of keyword search terms allowed through Google, each organization was searched twice: once using the IPV and Resource key words (see details below) and then again using the CM and Resource key words. The resulting lists of links generated by both searches were opened sequentially to scan for relevant training resources, materials, and opportunities. Additional hand searching of the website was limited to two pages beyond the initial Google site search link. The rationale for this limit was that the Google site search would be expected to produce the relevant resources if they met the keyword search criteria.

Key Word Search Terms:

The inventorying of training materials, resources, and opportunities available on each of websites searched for our scan was made possible by combining keywords from the clusters of English or French key words detailed in Table 2 and entering them into the Google site search function. Unilingual English organizations were searched using the English keywords, only. Unilingual French organizations were searched with French keywords. Bilingual organizations were searched using the English keywords, only.

Inclusion Criteria for the Organizations List:

The following criteria were required for inclusion on the organizations list. Each organization was to:

- Be based in Canada AND
- Address family violence AND
- Have a mandate related to health and social service provision, research, policy OR
- Have a health care provider or social work audience and a mandate related to health and social service provision, research, or policy.

The resulting list of 197 organizations were divided into eight primary categories: health and social service provider colleges, health and social service provider associations, federal government organizations, provincial government organizations, specialty-specific organizations, research-oriented organizations, policy-oriented organizations, and service-oriented organizations.

The organization list was distributed to the RISE Project leadership team, who have expertise in IPV, CM, CEIPV, and education scholarship. The RISE Project leadership were asked to review the organization list for completeness, understanding that this list was non-exhaustive and that through the hand search process, additional organizations of relevance might be identified and added. Once the list was given approval by the RISE Project Leadership team, the inventorying of training materials, resources and opportunities began.

Inclusion Criteria for Training Materials:

Data collected for the environmental scan consisted of open access or publicly available training/ education materials, resources or opportunities (collectively referred to as ‘training materials’) with a Canadian medical or social work audience. For the purposes of this scan, the included training materials were those that:

- Were available without requiring any affiliation or additional registration to be accessed by an online user;
- Focused on describing or developing KASB related to family violence, inclusive of IPV, CM and CEIPV
- Were intended for a professional audience that includes social workers or physicians in psychiatry, paediatrics, emergency medicine, or family medicine;
- Were developed or adapted for a Canadian audience since 2000;
- Were produced by or for a hosting organization, or explicitly recommended by such organization (e.g., a resource that is hosted by a website, but that has not been explicitly recommended would not be included; a resource that is intentionally linked to the webpage under a ‘Suggested Training/Reading’ heading would be included); and
- Were available in French or English.

Data Extraction

Once specific training material was identified that met the inclusion criteria, information about the material including the URL, title, producing organization, target audience, and date of publication were entered into a data extraction form by a member of the research team. In addition, a short description of each training resource was developed from the data extraction sheet. This description included, where relevant: the topic, relevant area(s) of family violence (i.e., IPV, CM, and/or CEIPV), intended professional audience, and learning objectives. Copies of all materials were saved and later reviewed by the Lead of the environmental scan, Alice Cavanagh. French language resources were reviewed by the bilingual Research Assistant.

At the end of the inventorying and data extraction process, a complete list of the included training materials was circulated to the RISE leadership team for their review; the RISE leadership team were asked to review the list of training materials with the goal of generating consensus about the completeness of the list and to identify any additional or outlying training materials that may be missing from the scan results. No additional resources were identified by the RISE leadership team.

Results

A total of 22,775 potential links to training materials were reviewed through our search procedure. Two hundred and eighty-five (285) training materials produced by organizations; professional colleges; provider associations; and government departments, ministries, and agencies across Canada met our inclusion criteria. Figures 1 thru 3 provide a graphical overview of the identified training materials by language, audience, and type of family violence. Specifically, of the 285 training materials, 84 were in French and 203 were in English (Figure 1). As shown in Figure 2, 86 of the training materials included both physicians and social workers in their audience, while 157 were for an audience that included social workers and not physicians, and 42 were for an audience that included physicians and not social workers. Figure 3 indicates that majority of the training materials addressed IPV (207); CM was addressed in 136, and CEIPV in 52. Formats of the identified training materials ranged from research reports, to protocol and policy manuals, to fact sheets, guidebooks, infographics, position statements, and webinars. Two hundred and fourteen (214) of the training materials that we identified had been released or revised in the last ten years, and 139 of those had been released in the last five years. Appendix A provides the full menu of training materials identified in the present environmental scan. Brief summaries of each of the identified training materials are presented in the same language in which the training material was collected.

Conclusion

A recent report from the Canadian Institute for Health Information indicates that physicians and social workers are among the largest groups of health and social service providers in Canada;²² as such, medical and social work professionals have a significant role in the recognition and response to family violence on the frontlines of health and social service provision. This report provides a detailed overview of the RISE Project's environmental scan, which involved a focused scan of publicly available family violence training materials for social work and physician audiences. The resulting menu of 285 family violence training materials were produced by Canadian organizations and published since 2000. As one component of the overall RISE Project, the purpose of the menu was to provide a repository of training materials, resources, and opportunities, in an easily accessible format, for the members of our Collaborating Organizations. The Environmental Scan represents an important policy and practice driver of supporting population-level improvements in practitioner knowledge, attitudes, skills, and behaviours related to recognizing and responding to family violence in clinical practice.

Importantly, the results of this environmental scan include descriptive summaries of each identified training resource and do not include an analysis or evaluation of the menu's contents. Health and social service providers who are interested in consulting this list of resources can freely view the menu, here. Future health and social service providers who consult this list of resources are encouraged to determine the value and quality of the content for their specific educational needs. Additionally, each resource listed on this menu represents a training resource that was accessible to the public during the scanning period. These resources, however, are not necessarily available in perpetuity and may not be available if the organization discontinues or removes the resource URL.

Acknowledgements

This completion of the RISE Project's environmental scan was led by Alice Cavanagh (RISE Project Research Consultant) and Dr. Meredith Vanstone (RISE Project Co-Lead). Additional expert consultation was provided by the RISE Project leadership team, including those named above as well as the Lead Dr. Melissa Kimber, Co-Lead Dr. Donna Stewart, Co-Investigators Drs. Gina Dimitropoulos and Delphine Collin-Vezina, and VEGA advisor, Dr. Harriet MacMillan. The RISE Project's research coordinator, Ilana Alice, prepared the initial draft of the report to the Public Health Agency of Canada. The team would like to extend special thanks to RISE Project research assistant, Ash Lowenthal, who identified and provided summaries for all French-language training materials. Additional thanks to Anita Acai, interim research coordinator, for reviewing the draft report. The team responsible for completing data collection and extraction, in alphabetical order, included: Ilana Alice, Rya Buckley, Alice Cavanagh, Cara Evans, Ayda Ferdossifard, Breanna Kehler, Ash Lowenthal, and Damanjit Sandhu.
